SHARMA ICONOGRAPHY OF SĀDĀS'IVA

THE BOOK

The book deals with the iconography of Sadasiva, an important form of Lord Siva. It has four chapters: Sadasiva, Mahasadasiva, the Consort of Sadasiva, and Resume.

The Sadasiva aspect of Siva, having five heads and ten arms, did not receive much attention from the scholars so far. The present book envisages to bring together all the material bearing on the subject. A number of photographs, mostly of unpublished sculptures, bronzes and miniature paintings representing different phases of Indian art, illustrate the text and make the book useful for the students of art, iconography, religion and philosophy.

The seven appendices, appended in the end, provide information as gleaned from religious and secular literature related to the subject.

FOREWORD

It gives me great pleasure to introduce the book of Doctor B.N. Sharma, a well-known scholar as historian of Indian art and as vidyārthī who masters Indian thought.

The Hindu images of Gods and the Buddhist ones as well, are not only to be admired as works of art—it thus may be a mere : “bahiraṅgaparīkṣā” —but to be read, so to say, as a literary text. There is the exoteric way of looking at them, as a stranger or a simple devotee can do; it is the relative form which is the basis for further concentration and meditation which may gradually lead to higher intuitions : kramamukti. Then there is another way of reading them; an esoteric one which allows the man who has been initiated to the inner meaning of the doctrine to understand the image in its full significance, in its spiritual tattva. The image then turns into a kind of book, written in those apparently strange symbols or aspects, many arms, many heads, many legs and so on. So the aesthetical appreciation of those figures is only based on a pratibimba of very high and complicated truths. Anyhow the aesthetical contemplation when we are lost into it, can lead us to that enosis, that anirvacanīya identity with the supreme truth. Abhinavagupta rightly discusses on this delicate point of the esoteric value of the aesthetic contemplation which makes us surpass the duality of the empyric form.

All this will appear very clear to the reader of the book of Doctor Sharma on Sadāśiva, one of the most popular gods of India, where his images are worshipped from one corner to another of Bhāratavarṣa. Behind them there are meanings absconded to the profane, I mean the highest speculations which man ever created; to the highest metaphysic to the deeper devotion. Because metaphysic does not dissolve but exalts bhakti. All those images go back to origins of very old times; there are condensed in them thousands of years of thinking and meditation, and their proper understanding needs a full familiarity with an immense philosophical speculation. The mūrti is the beginning of the path which leads to a faint understanding of the Real. When new approaches to God are discovered, even the images are transfigured; their visual appearances assume a new shape: they are figurations of the Divine accessible to the human limitations.

Images, books and even living century-old traditions go together: therefore only when one remembers all this, one can appreciate in its proper meaning the value of the present book, which is at the same time a chapter of the history of Indian art and an introduction to Śaiva doctrines that developed around Sadāśiva, so well introduced by Doctor Sharma, with the famous hymn of Śaṅkārācārya.

PREFACE

No study is more fascinating than the study of Lord Śiva in his various forms. He is the God of gods (Devadeva, Mahādeva), the Enlightener of the universe (Jagat-Guru), the Lord of Yogīs (Yogīśvara) and at the same time the God of the spirits (Bhūteśvara), the Lord of the animals (Paśupati) and also the Lord of dance (Naṭarāja). Worship of Śiva has been widely popular in India since very early times. Even now, there are temples of the god in every village and town in India, where people throng daily to his worship and also to gain religious merit.

Several scholars like T. A. Gopinatha Rao, A.K. Coomaraswamy, V.S. Agrawala, J.N. Banerjea, C. Sivaramamurti and others have written monumental works on various forms of Śiva. H. Mitra in his learned article on Sadāśiva has traced the evolution and development of Sadāśiva worship in Bengal. And T.A. Gopinatha Rao has elaborately discussed the philosophic aspect of Sadāśivamūrti and Mahāsadāśivamūrti in his Elements of Hindu Iconography. I have also made an attempt in the present book to bring together from different sources the relevant material bearing on the subject. A number of photographs mostly of the unpublished sculptures, bronzes and paintings have been added to give a comprehensive idea of various types of representations of the god like the Chatushpāda-Sadāśiva, Aṣṭapāda-Mahāsadāśiva and the Consort of Sadāśiva, which did not find place in the earlier works on Hindu iconography. It is hoped that the book will be of some interest to the scholars and students of Indian art and iconography.

I am deeply obliged to Padma Bhushan C. Sivaramamurti, former Director, National Museum, New Delhi, for his kind encouragement and valuable suggestions. I am also very grateful to Dr. Giuseppe Tucci, President, Istituto Italiano Per Il Medio Ed Estremo Oriente, Rome, for kindly contributing a valuable Foreword for it.

I am grateful to Dr. Wladimir Zwalf, Dr. V.P. Dwivedi, Śrī T.R. Agrawala and my elder brother Śrī Y.N. Sharma, for offering me some useful suggestions. I am thankful to Śrī V.R. Nambiar, Dr. N.P. Joshi, Dr. H.R. Gaudani, Dr. Mary C. Lanius, Dr. Ronald Y. Otsuka, Dr. Ananda Krishna, Dr. K. Krishnamurti, Śrī V.N. Srivastava and Śrī C.M. Srivastava, for supplying me photographs for the book. My thanks are due to Smt. Raka Jain for nicely preparing a line-drawing of the devī painting and also to Śrī B. Sahi for tracing several old books from the Library of the Archaeological Survey of India.

Lastly, I am thankful to Śrī Śakti Malik, Proprietor, Abhinav Publications, New Delhi, for the special interest he took in the early publication of this book.

If there are any errors, I crave the indulgence of the readers, for the subject of Śiva is so vast and varied as rightly pointed out by the celebrated poet Kālidāsa that nobody is able to understand His real form correctly :

SADĀŚIVA

महेशं सुरेशं सुरारातिनाशं
 विभुं विश्वनाथं विभूत्यङ्गभूषम् ।
 विरुपाक्षमिन्द्रकवह्नित्रिनेत्रं
 सदानन्दमीडे प्रभुं पञ्चवक्त्रम् ॥

Śrī Śaṅkarācārya paying his obeisance to Lord Śiva says, "I glorify the five-faced Lord Śiva, the ever blissful Ruler of gods, the all-pervading protector of the universe, the Reliever of the distress of gods, who has ashes for the ornament of His body, has an odd number of eyes, nay, who has the moon, the sun and fire for His three eyes."

The earliest representation of such a form of Śiva is found in the famous Śivaliṅga from Bhita (Allahabad district) of 2nd century B.C., now preserved in the State Museum, Lucknow (No. H.4; ht. 84 cms; Pl. I). The sculpture has five faces and bears a two-line inscription which reads :

- 1.1. खजहुति पुतनं (f)लंगो पतिथापितो
- 1.2. वासेठि पुतेन नागसिरिना पियतं देवता ।

i.e., 'The liṅga of the sons of Khajahuti was dedicated by Nāgasiri (Nāgaśrī), the son of Vāsethi (Vāśishṭhi); may the deity be placed.'

The five faces of the god carved on the liṅga suggest the five-fold aspects of Śiva composing the

2 Iconography of Sadāśiva

Sadāśiva form. The Śaiva Āgamas consider Sadāśiva as the highest and the Supreme being—formless, beyond the comprehension of anyone, subtle, luminous, and all-pervading.²

The five faces representing Tatpuruṣa, Aghora, Vāmadeva, Sadyojāta and Īśāna are collectively known as Pañcha-brahmas and they are regarded to be emanations from the nishkala Śiva (the formless, unmanifested Para-brahma).³ The Śaivites regard these heads as symbolising the soul, material world, buddhi, ahankāra and the mind.⁴

In the Kushāṇa art of Mathura, the Śivaliṅga is a post, like the sacrificial post, with a flower garland wound round it at the top (N.M. No. 65.172; ht. 72 cms; Pl. II). It has four heads facing the four cardinal directions. These heads differently have a ūshnīṣa, a jatā-makuta, curly hair and the shaven head, representing ūshnīṣin, kapardin and other aspects of the deity. Such Śivaliṅgas which were installed for worship on a platform of a mandapikā having four pillars : चतुस्तम्भ स्फटिक मण्डपिका तल प्रतिष्ठितं चतुर्मुखं त्र्यम्बकम्, as recorded by Bāṇa in his Kādambarī, are the precursors of the Gupta⁵ and early mediaeval⁶ Śivaliṅgas executed in different parts of North India.

The Rūpamaṇḍana, an important iconographic text of 15th century A.D., gives interesting details about three-, one- and four-faced mukhaliṅgas. In a one-faced liṅga, the face should be depicted in front and in a three-faced one, the back face is absent. In a four-faced liṅga, the western face is white, the northern red, the southern black and terrific, while the eastern face has the colour of well-kindled fire.

The five faces represent the five aspects of Śiva, namely, Sadyojāta, Vāmadeva, Aghora and Tatpurusha. The fifth face of Īśāna is beyond the ken even of the Yogīs.⁷ The Īśāna face is, therefore, not generally shown and is simply represented like a dome in a Chaturmukhalinga.

In the mediaeval iconography besides the chaturmukhalingas having a circular top, the five aspects of Śiva are also shown in one image which is known as Sadāśiva. Such sculptures generally have five faces and ten arms. But there are a few exceptions also, as in some images the number of heads and arms sometimes differs from the description given in the iconographic texts. The Vishnudharmottara Purāṇa, Śiva Purāṇa, Aparājitapṛchchā, Rūpamaṇḍana and several other works give details about the five heads which constitute the Sadāśiva form Śiva.

The Vishnudharmottara Purāṇa enjoins that Sadyojāta, which faces west, is of pearl-like colour of the full moon and represents earth (Prthvī); Vāmadeva faces north, has red colour and represents water (Jala); Aghora which faces south is dark-blue and represents fire (Agni); Tatpurusha faces east, has golden yellow colour and represents air (Vāyu) and Īśāna facing upwards, has crystal-white colour and represents sky (Ākāśa). These heads are also individually known as Mahādeva (eastern), Bhairava (southern), Nandivaktra (western), Umāvaktra (northern) and Sadāśiva (the fifth face on the top also known as Īśāna). The ten arms of the god representing ten directions hold various attributes.⁸

The Aparājitapṛchchā mentions the above five aspects of Śiva in the list of the eleven Rudras, and the Rūpamaṇḍana describes them among the twelve images of Śiva. According to the latter work, Sadyojāta should wear a jaṭā-makuta and have his hands held in abhaya and varada-poses. Vāmadeva should wear a red dress, red sacred-thread, red garland, red uśnīsha and carry a sword and a shield in his hands. Aghora should have a terrific look and should wear cobras on his head, in the ears, neck etc., and a garland of human skulls. His colour is blue. He holds in his right hands a trident, a battle-axe, or sword and a daṇḍa; while his left hands carry a khaṭvāṅga, a kapāla, a shield and a bow. Tatpuruṣa wears a yellow garment and a yellow sacred thread and his two hands hold a rosary and a citron. Īśāna is of white complexion and carries a triśūla and a kapāla in his hands. The Rūpamaṇḍana alone describes Aghora with eight arms, while all other texts mention him as a two-armed figure. Excepting Vāmadeva, who has two eyes, the others have three eyes representing the sun, the moon and the fire. Īśāna face is beyond the comprehension of even the great sages :

पञ्चमं च तथेशानं योगिनामप्यगोचरम् ॥

—Rūpamaṇḍana, IV, 94.

Scholars generally believe that the images of Sadāśiva from Bengal were probably inspired by southern traditions as the Sena kings trace their origin from South India.⁹ One of the earliest Sadāśivamūrti datable to Pallava-Chola transitional period, 9th century A.D., is known from Kaveripakkam in North Arcot district of Tamil Nadu

(Pl. III). Most of the arms of the deity are damaged and in the surviving right hands he holds a ḍamaru, a sword, and one was probably held in abhaya-pose, while one of the left hands held a trident or an axe.

Images of Sadāśiva from North India excepting Bengal are not very well-known, yet it cannot be believed that they were altogether unknown to the artists of this part of the country. Even now, at many places, the images of the god are worshipped as Brahmā and Kārttikeya. At least two sculptures of Sadāśiva exist at Khajuraho in Madhya Pradesh.

The first life-size sculpture, probably once enshrined in one of the Śiva temples at Khajuraho, shows the deity seated in sukhāsana with the left leg doubled and the right pendant and resting on a lotus issuing from an inscribed base (Pl. IV). The pot-bellied deity has three visible faces, and wears a necklace, yajñōpavīta, dhoti and bears a śrīvatsa mark on the chest. Excepting his front hands which hold indistinct objects, his other arms are broken and lost. Seated figures of bearded Brahmā and headless Viṣṇu are depicted on right and left side respectively flanking the nimbus of Sadāśiva. The pedestal shows the figures of devotees and probably also the donors of the image.

The Khajuraho sculptures which present a great variety of Hindu icons also have several new iconographic types hitherto unknown in other parts of the subcontinent. Images of Śiva as Ekapāda and Tripāda-Bhairava are well-known from Rajasthan, Delhi, Orissa, Tamil Nadu and Nepal. But the master artist of Khajuraho also knew the iconography of four-legged Sadāśiva, probably not represented elsewhere in Indian art.

A badly damaged image, executed inside a niche on the Kaṇḍariyā Mahādeva temple at Khajuraho, shows a multi-armed god with his front right hand held in gift-bestowing attitude (Pl. V). The central face had two other crowned faces on its either side. But the unusual feature in this image is that unlike other deities, he has four legs (chatushpāda). His front legs are placed one above the other (cross-legged), while the other two are resting on the pedestal. These can be assigned to the Chandella period, 10th century A.D.

A unique image of Sadāśiva from eastern Uttar Pradesh is preserved in the State Museum, Lucknow (No. 66.45; Pl. VI). The pot-bellied god with three visible faces is seated in bhadrāsana-pose on a high seat wearing wooden sandals in his feet. His awe-inspiring face has a beard and moustache unlike any other image of the god known so far. He is ten-armed. His one right hand is damaged, while the others carry a sword (missing), *vyākhyāna-mudrā*¹⁰ with a rosary held between the thumb and index finger, a lotus, and a manuscript. The two surviving left hands hold a pāśa and a kaman-ḍalu. A male attendant and other figures are shown on either side of the god. Besides an elaborate jaṭā-makuta and sarpa-yajñopavīta, a yogaṭṭa is tied around his knees and the waist as also shown in the sculpture of Dakṣiṇāmūrti from Nanjan-godu, South India.

It is learnt from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa (IV, 6, 33-39) that when Brahmā and other gods proceeded to Kailāsa to appease Siva, they beheld him seated with his bent leg held in position by a yogapaṭṭa resting on his right thigh, one of his hands holding a rosary, and the other in expounding pose.

An unusual feature in this image is that instead of a bull, a lying male figure is shown as the vāhana of the deity. The image, datable to the Pratihāra period (10th century A.D.), reminds us of a beautiful panel, probably from the same region, showing six animal-faced Mātṛikās seated in a row with Śiva having a male mount lying in almost similar manner. This image is also displayed in the State Museum, Lucknow (No. H.33). It will not be out of place to mention here that several of the Yoginī sculptures at Bheraghat, Sohagpur and Naresar in Madhya Pradesh, also have similar male figures as their vāhanas. It is, therefore, no wonder that the two sculptures exhibited in the State Museum, Lucknow, were also executed under the influence of Tāntricism.

The pedestal of the Sadāśiva image bears an inscription "Om Batukeśvaraḥ", which appears to be the local name by which the deity was known in the region, where the image was originally installed for worship.

An image of Sadāśiva with consort is on display in the Denver Art Museum, Denver (No. O.1619; ht. 47 cms; Pl. VII).¹¹ The three faces of the god are Bhairava, Mahādeva and Umāvaktra, recalling the famous so-called Trimūrti at Elephanta (frontispiece) and also the one from Padhavalī now in the Gwalior Museum (Pl. VIII). The god is ten-armed and holds a trident entwined by a cobra, a sword, a cup, a rosary and taking out an arrow from the quiver with one of his hands. His three left hands are visible, two of which carry a shield and a bow, while the third is held near the breast of his spouse seated on his left thigh and joyfully looking towards him. The high jaṭā-makūṭa of the god is decorated with human skulls. Images of Gaṇeśa and Kārttikeya are shown on right and left sides of their parents and the couchant bull Nandi is depicted in front. From the stone as well as the modelling of the figures, the image appears to have been executed in the hilly region of Uttar Pradesh during the Pratihāra period, 11th century A.D.

That the sculptors of Gujarat also knew the iconography of Sadāśiva is evident from a marble image of the god under worship in the Vaidyanātha Mahādeva temple at Patan, North Gujarat (Pl. IX). His front right hand is in varada-mudrā and in others, he holds a trident, a kettle-drum, a cobra, a citron and other attributes. Miniature figures of Brahmā and Viṣṇu are shown on either side of his halo. His vāhana, the couchant Nandi-bull, is depicted in front on the inscribed base. The image belongs to the Chaulukya period, c. 12th century A.D.

Worship of Sadāśiva was specially popular during the Pāla and Sena periods in Bengal.¹² The Sena kings were Parama-Śaiva, and hence, propagated Śaivism during their reign in Bengal. Several copper-plate grants of the Sena kings bear the figure of this deity on their seals. The identity of such figures on the seals is revealed by its name as 'Sadāśiva-mudrā' in the Idilpur copper-plate of Keśavasena,¹³ and Sadāśivamudrayā-mudrayitvā in the Madanpada copper-plate inscription of Viśvarūpasena.¹⁴ Similarly, the seal of the Barrackpur grant of Vijayasena¹⁵ and the India Office plate of Lakshmanasena¹⁶ bear the usual Sena device, the image of Sadāśiva. But it has to be noted here that the figures of Sadāśiva on the seals disagree with the stone images and also with the description found in literary texts.¹⁷

A number of images of Sadāśiva fashioned both in metal and stone and found in different parts of Bengal are preserved in several museums. Among these, a rare image of the god in bronze and carved in the round is a masterpiece of the Pāla workmanship of 11th century A.D. (Pl. X). The deity is seated cross-legged on a double lotus pedestal with his vāhana, the bull, depicted in the front. He has four visible heads facing the four directions and ten arms. His two right hands are in abhaya and varada-poses, while in the three he holds a bow, a vajra and a śūla. His left hands carry a damaru, a cobra, an arrow, varada-mudrā and a citron-fruit. The four heads with high jaṭās wear three-pronged tiaras, which is very common in the sculptures of the Pāla period. The faces have different expressions which signify the various aspects of the deity. It is displayed in the V.R.S. Museum, Rajshahi (No. 673; ht. 10 cms).

The stone sculptures of Sadāśiva excepting for a few minor details are quite alike in their iconographic features. Some fine sculptures of late Pāla workmanship are displayed in the V.R.S. Museum, Rajshahi. Among these, the first image (No. C (b)

10 Iconography of Sadāśiva

1/235; Pl. XI) shows the deity seated cross-legged on a lotus seat carrying various weapons in his ten hands. An important feature in the image is that the god has ūrdhva-liṅga :

लिङ्गार्धमूर्ध्वगं कुर्यात्

—Matsya Purāṇa, 260, 7

which suggests his spiritual and physical equilibrium. It can also be noticed in the early sculptures of Śiva from Mathura and Kausambi. It is also interesting to note that besides his attendants, shown on either side of the lion-throne, even the vidyādharas flying amidst the clouds are depicted carrying arms. The personified figures of the river goddesses Gaṅgā and Yamunā with pūrṇa-ghaṭas in their hands are shown standing in service and devotion.¹⁸

The other image in the same Museum (No. C (b) 2/180; Pl. XII) has several features in common with the icon referred to above. Śiva as Dakṣiṇāmūrti is the great teacher of the universe and the same idea is expressed in these images also as the two hands of the god are held near the chest in the preaching attitude

A slightly unfinished image of Sadāśiva is preserved in the Asutosh Museum, Calcutta (Pl. XIII). His front two hands are held near the chest in vyākhyāna-mudrā. One right hand is in varadamudrā and the others carry a khaṭvāṅga, a triśūla and a śūla. His left hands carry a sanāla-padma, a damaru, a sarpa and a bija-pūraka. His faces have the third eye mark and he has ūrdhva-liṅga. It is also datable to the Pāla period, 11th century A.D.

An exquisitely carved image of Sadāśiva is on display in the Indian Museum, Calcutta (Pl. XIV).

He holds the same attributes as in the previous icon. Besides the other usual figures, the bull Nandi is depicted on the extreme left corner of the inscribed pedestal. The ornate crowns, jewellery and the profusely decorated stela suggest that it was made by a gifted artist of the Sena period, 12th century A.D.

After the Muslim conquest of Bihar and Bengal in the first-half of the 13th century A.D., the local artists migrated to Nepal and influenced the existing art and iconography of that country. An exquisite bronze image in repousse from Nepal shows the god seated cross-legged on a lotus (N.M. No. 71.71; ht. 23 cms; Pl. XV). The three-eyed faces of the god are beautifully decorated with a row of mūṇḍas on the heads. He wears ear ornaments, necklaces, armlets, bracelets and dhori secured with a girdle. The deity has ten arms, among which the two front hands are now lost. The other hands carry a dagger, a kettle-drum, a double-edged straight sword, a circular shield, a human head by his tuft of hair and other objects. The figure surrounded by an aureole of flames can be regarded an excellent example of c. 17th century A.D.

Mount Kailāsa, being the eternal abode of Lord Śiva, his worship in different forms was more popular than that of any other god in the Himalayan regions of India. Several beautiful bronzes and sculptures made during the late mediaeval period have been found in Himachal Pradesh. A bronze image of the god carved in the round is preserved in the National Museum, New Delhi (No. 71.72; ht. 12.6 cms; Pl. XVI). His four heads are facing the four directions. His front left hand is in the attitude of assuring protection to his devotees, while the other carries an antelope, which is so common in the images of Śiva from South India. The details of the faces are rubbed off, from which it can be surmised that the image was under worship for a long time. It can be dated to c. 16th century A.D.

Another bronze image is also deposited in the National Museum (No. 71.73; ht. 16 cms; Pls. XVII-XVIII). Besides the four heads, the fifth head representing the Īśāna aspect of the deity, faces the front, contrary to the tenets of iconographic texts, which mention that it should face the sky, as shown in the image of Pañchānana Śiva, enshrined in the Pañchavaktra temple at Mandi in Himachal Pradesh.¹⁹ As usual, he has ten arms which carry a trident, a sword, an axe, a cobra, a noose, a lotus, etc., and the rearmost right hand displays abhaya-mudrā. His consort, known as Manonmanī, is seated on his left thigh facing her Lord. The typical lotus-seat, the stylised figures of the divine couple and their mounts, the bull and the lion, point to its origin in the Chamba area in c. 16th century A.D.

Images of Sadāśiva are also known from South India. One such bronze image is housed in the National Museum, New Delhi (No. 47.109/166; ht. 10.5 cms; Pl. XIX). The deity, shown seated on a tiger's skin, holds various attributes in his hands, namely, a disc, a trident, a damaru, a pāśa, a kapāla, etc. The bottom right hand is in abhaya-mudrā and the corresponding left in varada-mudrā. His vāhana, the bull, is absent. The image is datable to c. 16th century A.D.

A number of miniature paintings from the former hill states of North India also depict Sadāśiva in different pleasing poses. An inscribed painting in the Kangra style of the late 18th century A.D., displayed in the Bhuri Singh Museum, Chamba, interestingly shows the five-faced and ten-armed god riding on his mount the bull, representing the four-legged Dharma (Pl. XX). He has cobras as his ornaments and wears a muṇḍa-mālā and a tiger's skin. His two right hands are held in varada and abhaya-poses and in the other three he holds a barchhā (a kind of lance), a triśūla and probably an axe (?). His left hands carry a cup, a cobra, a lotus, a damaru and a rosary. The one line inscription above mentions the colours of his three-eyed different faces. It says that Sadyojāta, Īśāna, Vāmadeva, Tatpurusha and Aghora are respectively white, black, yellow, red and blue. But this description partly differs from the literary texts mentioned above.

A charming painting in the collection of the National Museum, New Delhi (No. 58.21/16; Pl. XXI) has the fifth head of Īśāna under an umbrella facing the sky thus reminding us of the famous Bhita Śivaliṅga referred to above. The mode of holding the attributes in his hands differs from the previous painting and instead of a kapāla, a lotus and a rosary, he has a noose (?), a bell and a goad in the left hands. It seems that the god is seated on a throne on a marble balcony under the open sky. It is executed in the Kangra style, 1825-50 A.D.

In a beautiful painting of c. 1770 A.D. Sadāśiva is seated on mount Kailāsa with his consort Pārvatī on the left and their sons Gaṇeśa and Kārttikeya on his right (N.M. No. 63.1450; Pl. XXII). It should be noted that the artists of the late mediaeval period generally did not strictly follow the iconographic rules in giving the number of heads and arms of the god and hence, in some sculptures and paintings, the god may have less or more than the prescribed number of heads and arms and similarly the attributes held in his hands also vary in different representations. In the present painting, he has only four hands, among which two carry a cup and a battle-axe. A mouse, peacock, bull and lion, the mounts of the deities, are depicted in front.

The Bharat Kala Bhavan, Varanasi, also has a miniature painting from Mandi datable to 18th century A.D. (No. 6749; Pl. XXIII) representing Sadāśiva. The god with his five heads visible in the front is seated cross-legged on a lotus. The three-eyed faces bear an ardha-chandra (crescent moon) on the forehead and the locks of hair tied up high are fastened with a snake. He wears ornaments of rudrāksha beads, a garland of human skulls and a tiger's skin as his lower garment with the face of the animal depicted in front. The right hands carry a rosary falling below the right knee, a kapāla, a trident, a sword and the raised hand is probably assuring protection. In the left hands, he holds a shield, a khāṇḍā, an indistinct object, and a bell, while the front left is held in varada-mudrā. The colours of the painting have peeled off at places.

An excellent painting of Basohli style of 1740 A.D., illustrating a story from the Bhāgavata Purāṇa (IV, 24), is also worth mentioning here.²⁰ Now preserved in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

(No. 63.144), it shows Sadāśiva seated cross-legged on a decorated throne with Prachetās, the sons of king Prāchīnabarhi (so-called because of his having covered the earth's surface with blades of kuśa grass with their pointed ends turned eastwards) and Śatadruti (a daughter of the deity presiding over the ocean), standing before him with hands held near the chest in adoration. The three-eyed, five-faced and ten-armed god, besides wearing a tiara on each head, has a snake round the neck and is clothed in a tiger's skin. His front right hand holds a rosary, the lower end of which is supported by the corresponding left hand. In his remaining hands the god holds clock-wise a noose, a mace, a battle-axe, a double-edged straight sword, a trident, a shield, a cup and probably a horn. The masterly treatment of this Purāṇic story has been done by the gifted artist in a remarkable manner.

Another miniature, also probably painted at Mandi in the late 18th century A.D., shows simply a four-armed god with a crescent-shaped battle-axe and a triśūla tied with a ḍamaru in his rear hands, his lower right is in abhaya-mudrā and the corresponding left in varada-mudrā (N.M. No. 60.1560; Pl. XXIV). The fifth head which should be towards the sky as shown in Plate XXI, is facing towards the front as also depicted in the bronze image of the deity (Pl. XVII). His consort is seated on his lap and the couchant Nandi is depicted in front.

A miniature painting of Sadāśiva with his Śakti, prepared during Maratha rule in the late 18th century A.D., is exhibited in Śrī Bhavānī Museum, Aundh (No. 1060; Pl. XXV). All five faces have ūrdhva-trinetra on the foreheads. A small head of the personified river goddess Gaṅgā is depicted in the centre with its sacred waters falling on the right side of the god and flowing downwards. The deity holds a spouted jar, a rosary, a snake, an arrow and a trident in his right hands; while his left carry a patākā, a damaru, a ghaṇṭā, abhaya and a dhanuṣa. His consort is seated on his thigh with Gaṇeśa in her lap. Besides the bull, Nārada, the divine musician is also shown standing and carrying his musical instrument.

Images of Sadāśiva are fashioned even now for worship by the pious as is proved by a fine modern bronze preserved in the State Museum, Lucknow (No. 37.878; Pls. XXVI-XXVII). It was acquired by the museum authorities from Varanasi, which is a great centre of Śiva worship and also famous for one of the twelve Jyotirlingas.

The five-headed god is seated cross-legged on a full-blown lotus with his front right hand in the attitude of assuring protection to his devotees. In his other right hands he holds a triśūla, a vajra, a khaḍga and a paraśu, while his left hands carry a broken object, agni, a ghaṇṭā, a pāśa and a sarpa. A crescent-moon referred to in the Bilhari inscription of the Chedi king Yuvarājadeva II, as 'a nectar-rayed unique flower in the forest of Śiva's matted hair' : is also beautifully shown on one of his heads.

Thus it is evident from the above that the worship of a five-faced Śiva can be traced back to the Śuṅga period (2nd-1st century B.C.). In the Kushāṇa period, the worship of the Chaturmukha-līṅga having a circular top, which also represented the five aspects of the god, became a common mode of worship. During the Gupta and later periods, fashioning of the chaturmukhaliṅgas became even more popular. Such liṅgas besides being enshrined in temples were also installed on a platform under a tree for worship.

New iconographic forms of gods and goddesses were evolved during the early mediaeval period. The ideology underlying the chaturmukhaliṅga was transformed into a purely human form which gave the deity five heads and ten arms holding different attributes. But as the description of Sadāśivamūrti varies in different texts, the images likewise often differ in their iconographic details. Besides these, there are certain sculptures like the inscribed image in the State Museum, Lucknow and chatushpāda-Sadāśiva from Khajuraho, about which we do not have any detailed description in our present state of knowledge.

CHAPTER II

MAHĀSADĀŚIVA

Mahāsadāśiva is another important aspect of Śiva. The Mānasāra as quoted by T.A.G. Rao gives a detailed description of Mahāsadāśivamūrti. It states that the god should have twenty-five faces, seventy-five eyes and fifty arms and should wear jatā-makutas and kuṇḍalas besides the snake ornaments. His two hands should display abhaya and varada-poses.¹

The Rūpamaṇḍana mentions a multi-faced Sadāśiva. Though the text does not describe the number of heads of such a deity, yet from the number of arms which are given as sixteen, it appears that the icon referred to here belongs to Mahāsadāśiva variety. His right hands hold a damaru, a sudarśana, a sarpa, a śūla, an aṅkuśa, a kumbha, a kaumudī and a jayamālā; while the left carry a ghaṇṭā, a kapāla, a khaṭvāṅga, tarjaṇī, a kuṇḍikā, a dhanuśa, a paraśu and a paṭṭīśa :

बहुरूपो दधद् दक्षे डमरुं च सुदर्शनम् ।

सर्पं शूलाङ्कशौ कुम्भं कौमुदीं जयमालिकाम् ॥

घण्टाकपालखट्वाङ्गतर्जनी कुण्डिकां धनु ।

परशुं पट्टिशं चेति वामोष्ठोदिक्रमेण हि ॥

—Rūpamaṇḍana, IV, 23-24.

Images of Mahāsadāśiva, though quite rare, have been found represented in stone, bronze and also in miniature paintings.

Though numerous sculptures of Śiva in his various forms are known from North India, yet no image of Mahāsadaśiva has been published so far from the upper part of the country. A rare life-size sculpture of chatushpāda-Mahāsadaśiva is exhibited in the Archaeological Museum, Khajuraho (Pl. XXVIII). His heads arranged horizontally in two tiers remind us of the figures of Skanda-Kārttikeya depicted on some early Yaudheya coins and a dome-like projection above suggests the Īśāna aspect of the deity. His surviving lower right hand is held in gift-bestowing attitude and the four legs are arranged as in the image of Sadāśiva carved on the Kaṇḍariyā Mahādeva temple at Khajuraho (Pl. V). The sculpture can be dated to the Chandella period, 10th century A.D.

A colossal rock-cut sculpture of Mahāsadaśiva is carved near the Nīlakaṇṭha temple at Kalanjar in Madhya Pradesh (Pl. XXIX). The multi-armed god has several heads arranged horizontally in three rows. He holds a rosary, a khaṭvāṅga and a mātulaṅga and other attributes in his hands. He is shown ūrdhva-retas like some of the images of Sadāśiva from Bengal noticed in the previous chapter. A figure standing on the left of the god may represent either a devotee or an attendant. The image is datable to 13th century A.D.

A unique sculpture of Mahāsadaśiva carved in granite stone is in situ at Pedda Vengi in West Godavari district of Andhra Pradesh (Pl. XXX).² The ten-headed (arranged in one tier) and twenty-armed standing image of the god wears *jaṭā-makuta*s, jewellery and dhoti. He holds various āyudhas like a club, a trident, a sword, etc. His front right hand is held in abhaya-mudrā and the corresponding left decorated with a nāga-keyūra is resting on the thigh. The elegant sculpture showing the continuation of Eastern Chāḷukya traditions in the Kākatiya period can be dated to 13th century A.D.

Another equally important image of Mahāsadāśiva made of brick in mortar and corresponding to the textual description as given in the Mānasāra can be seen at Vaithisvarankoyil in Tanjore district of Tamil Nadu (Pl. XXXI). He has twenty-five faces; each of the five aspects of Śiva, i.e., Sadyojāta, Vāmadeva, Aghora, Tatpurusha and Īśāna being represented by five faces. "In this", as pointed out by T.A.G. Rao, "one other peculiarity is also observable, namely, the heads are arranged in tiers in arithmetical progression. The topmost tier has only one head, the next one below has three, the next five and so on till the last tier has nine heads. Only those heads which are on the borders of this triangle of heads could be adorned with jaṭā-makutaś and they alone are actually ornamented with these in the sculpture."³ The deity has several arms, two of which are held in abhaya and varada poses. The sculpture can be dated to 18th century A.D.

A unique miniature painting in the collection of the National Museum, New Delhi, shows the figure of a twenty-armed Mahāsadāśiva with ten heads and eight legs (No. 56.163; Pl. XXXII). As seen above, the Chandella sculptors of Khajuraho had fashioned images of chatushpāda-Sadāśiva and Mahāsadāśiva, but no other representation of the god as aṣṭapāda, as shown in the present painting, is known in the realm of Indian art. A crescent moon decorates his jata-makuta on each head and he wears a tiger's skin as his lower garment. The all powerful god is shown blessing an aged sage standing before him in adoration with his hands held near the chest in añjali-mudrā. The picturesque delineation of Mount Kailāsa in the background has several caves showing ascetics performing penances and celestial beings engaged in amorous dalliance.⁴ It is a magnificent painting of Kangra style, 18th century A.D.

Another rare miniature painting in the National Museum, New Delhi, shows an eighteen-armed Mahāsadāśiva seated with his Śakti on a full-blown lotus placed on the couchant Nandi (No. 60.1263; Pl. XXXIII). One of his right hands is in varada-mudrā, while in others he holds a bell, a noose, a human-skull, a goad, a pestle, a mace (gurja), a trident and paṭṭā-sword. His left hands carry a kettle-drum, a lance (barchhā), a club, a harpoon (?), battle-axes (tabara and pharasā), a human-head, while the front left is in abhaya-mudrā. Besides a crescent-moon on the central head, the deity also wears a long garland, a tiger's skin and other ornaments. His dishevelled hair flowing around the head, the fierce countenance and the depiction of various weapons in the hands of the deity suggest that he has been represented in his terrific aspect. This excellent painting of Kangra style appears to have been executed at Chamba in early 19th century A.D.

A brief survey of the above images reveals that only a few representations of Mahāsadāśiva have been found as compared to the icons of Sadāśiva. The images of Mahāsadāśiva also completely differ amongst each other. Excepting the image of the god from Vaithisvarankoyil, which is partly based on the description of the Mānasāra, the others do not tally with it. The Rūpamaṇḍana mentions an image of the god with sixteen arms, but no sculpture corresponding to this description has been published so far. It can, therefore, be inferred that the artists who prepared these images and paintings mainly based them on the rules of iconography prevalent in their own regions. But it is indeed quite surprising that excepting Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh, no image of Mahāsadaśiva has been published from Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh and Bengal, where the worship of Śiva was as popular as in any other part of the country during the mediaeval period.

CHAPTER III

CONSORT OF SADĀŚIVA

Muktā-vidruma-hema-nīla-dhavala-cchāyair-mukhe strī taṇair-yuktā mir̥du-nibaddha ratna-mukutā tattvārtha varṇāsmikām.

Gāyatrīm varadābhayāṅkuśa kaśām śubhrām kapālaṁ guṇaṁ śaṅkhaṁ cakra mathāravimdayagalaṁ hastair vahantīm.

“I celebrate Gāyatrī according to her nature, as a woman who has attained to spiritual freedom, having coral, golden, white, blue and dusky faces arranged in a row, with a jewelled crown adorned by the moon, bearing in her hands (the seals of) ‘charity’ and ‘fear not’, an elephant goad, a whip, a shining skull, a rosary, a chank, a whirling discus, and two lotus flowers.”¹

The Śakti or consort of Sadāśiva referred to as Gāyatrī in ancient Sanskrit texts on dhyānam or sādhana is a unique form of devī, whose worship appears to have been in vogue mainly in the hill state of Himachal Pradesh. The goddess when shown in the company of her Lord, Sadāśiva, is invariably represented as a normal female figure like Umā or Gaurī with one head and two arms. She has a benign expression and her hands are either held in adoration of the god or she carries a flower and a cup as her offerings to him.

The Śakti of Sadāśiva, when represented as an independent divinity as found in bronze images from Himachal Pradesh, has on the contrary five faces and ten arms and bears a terrific appearance like most of the images of Sadāśiva from that area. No literary or epigraphic description fully corresponding to this aspect of the devī is known so far. B. Ch. Chhabra on the basis of some Tāntric texts has tried to identify such figures with Svachchhanda-Bhairavī,² but the description does not fully agree with the iconographic features of such images. Another point of interest is that not a single stone sculpture illustrating this form of devī is known from Himachal Pradesh or elsewhere. Only a few bronzes and miniature paintings portraying the goddess in this particular aspect have come to our notice.

The two bronze images, fashioned in the hilly region of Chamba-Kangra during the mediaeval period, are preserved in the National Museum at New Delhi. The trefoil aureole, typical crown, ornaments and the modelling of the figures suggest an attribution to that area.

The first image, though less elaborate than the other, is earlier and has five faces and ten arms (No. 69.35; ht. 20.8 cms; Pl. XXXIV). The goddess is seated in paryāṅkāśana on her vehicle the personified Nandi.³ She is decked with ornaments and wears a garland of skulls (muṇḍa-mālā) and a lower garment. The three-peaked crowns on her heads are very similar to the crowns depicted in the Pahari miniature paintings. In her right hands, the goddess holds a double-edged sword, a trident, an axe and a skull, while her left hands carry a club, probably fire, a noose and a khaṭvāṅga. Her front right hand is in varada-mudrā and the corresponding left in the abhaya-pose.

Devī's mount, the personified four-armed Nandi, is seated cross-legged on a full-blown lotus mounted on a pedestal. His face is tilted up towards the devī in reverential manner. He supports her with his upper hands, while the lower hands are joined near the chest in añjali-mudrā. The figures are enclosed within a plain trefoil-shaped aureole. The image can be dated to 10th century A.D.

The second image of the consort of Sadāśiva is a piece of great artistic beauty (No. 64.102; ht. 37 cms; Pl. XXXV). The image, though quite similar to the earlier piece, is slightly different in its iconographical details. The goddess is seated at ease on her male vāhana. She wears bejewelled crowns and the quaint jewellery of that period. The terrific aspect of the goddess is suggested by her fifth grinning face and the flames shooting up from the crown. She has a third vertical eye on each face (the eye marks on her front faces are rubbed off). She has prominent breasts and an attenuated waist. In her right hands, she holds a double-edged sword, a lotus, a trident in a disc and a skull. Her left hands carry a goad, a noose, a manuscript and a jar of ambrosia. The fourth of the five right hands is in abhaya mudrā and the corresponding left is in the varada-pose. Thus, we notice a difference in the manner of holding the attributes. The hands of the four-armed vāhana are held in the same fashion as in the other image.

The interesting feature of this image is that it illustrates several other figures in the front. The

On the right side of the pedestal is nr̥tya-Gaṇapati. His left leg is resting on the ground, while the right is raised in dancing posture. The four-armed deity holds a rosary in his rear right hand and a battle-axe in the rear left; his lower right hand holds a tooth and the corresponding left carries a bowl of sweet-balls (modakas), on which the twisted tip of his proboscis is placed. On the left, is the figure of four-armed Śiva as Bhairava, dancing with his left leg planted on the ground and the right raised high above the shoulder (like the ūrdhva-tāṇḍava-pose). He holds clock-wise a trident, a cobra, a skull-cup and a khaṭvāṅga. Both the gods wear jewelled crowns and not jaṭā-makutaś, as found in North Indian mediaeval sculptures of the deities.

Under the right leg of Bhairava, a donor is seated with his hands in añjali-mudrā. The pedestal is inscribed with a mutilated five line inscription in Śāradā characters of 12th century A.D. A trefoil aureole showing on the outer rim an alternating flame and conch motif surrounds the figures of the goddess and her mount.

A fine painting of the goddess datable to 18th century A.D., is exhibited in the Museum für Indische Kunst, Berlin (No. I 5126; Pl. XXXVI). Her five faces having different colours bear third eye-mark and a crescent moon decorates the crown worn on the central head. She carries clock-wise a rosary of white beads, a mace, a goad, two lotuses, a disc, a conch and a skull-cup in her hands. Her front right hand is in varada-mudrā and the corresponding left is held in abhaya-pose. Her lotus seat is surrounded by implements of worship as also shown in almost a contemporary Kangra painting preserved in the Ross-Coomaraswamy collection of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston (No. 17.2576).⁴

Śrī Bhavānī Museum, Aundh, has also on display a rare painting representing the above aspect of devī (No. 106; Pl. XXXVII). She is seated cross-legged on a white lotus set on a decorated pedestal. She has five faces, having from the right red, golden, white, blue and yellow colours, symbolising the five aspects of Sadāśiva in his Śakti form. The goddess is ten-armed. Besides the two hands which are held in abhaya and varada-poses, the remaining three hold a whip (?), a goad and a disc. The left hands carry a conch, a kapāla, a rosary, and two carry lotuses. She wears tiaras on each head, nose-ornaments, and her rounded breasts and the bodily contours are similar to the bronze images of the devī noted above. But here, her vāhana and other figures are absent. This Pahari painting belongs to the Kangra style of the late 18th century A.D.

Tāntricism had become widespread in North India during the mediaeval period. The kapāla and khatvāṅga carried by the goddess suggest Tāntric affiliations. As no image of this variety has been discovered from other parts of the country, it appears that this particular form of the goddess, as the consort of Sadāśiva, was popular in the hilly region of North-Western India.

3. Śiva as well as Māheśvarī, his Śakti and one of the Mātṛkās, have Nandi as their vāhanas. Secondly, Nandīśvara whether shown alone or with his consort is also often represented in human form. It can, therefore, be surmised that the human figure shown here as the mount of consort of Sadāśiva, represents the personified form of Nandi.

CHAPTER IV

RESUME²

A review of the material in the foregoing pages reveals that the worship of Lord Śiva, both in his aniconic and anthropomorphic forms has existed in India since early times. A Śivaliṅga had the same significance as the human representation of the Lord and was duly worshipped along with Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara :

तथा ब्रह्माणमेव विष्णुमेव रुद्रमेव विभक्तांस्त्रीनेव अविभक्तांस्त्रीनेव
लिङ्गरूपेणैव च सम्पूज्योपहारैश्चतुर्धा ।

—Nṛsiṃhatāpani Upanishad, Uttara, 1, 3, 9.

The Bhita and the Gudimallam liṅgas testify to this form of worship in the 2nd-1st century B.C. The developed form of both these liṅgas makes it apparent that they continue a long established tradition. As seen earlier, the inscribed Bhita liṅga has five heads, which represent Śiva (Pañchānana) in his Sadāśiva form. Some early references to this form are found in the Kaivalya Upanishad (7, 18) and Taittiriya Āranyaka (X, 43-47).

During the early centuries of the Christian era, though several images of Śiva as Ardhanārīśvara and Harihara were carved by the sculptors of Mathura, the deity as Sadāśiva was simply represented by a chaturmukhalīṅga with a rounded dome suggesting his Īśāna aspect. This tradition continued in the Gupta period as well, as is evident from several four-faced liṅgas found at different places in Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh. It is indeed quite surprising that the master artists of the Gupta period, who evolved several new iconographic types of various Hindu deities, seem not to have carved images of Sadāśiva in human form, the more so since it is referred to in the contemporary Vishṇudharmottara Purāṇa.

In the early mediaeval period, Sadāśiva was worshipped both in the liṅga and human forms. The chaturmukhaliṅgas in Gurukul Kangri Museum, Haridwar, and the one under worship at Kanauj are among the most notable examples of this period. It will also be interesting to note that in many of the stone sculptures of Umāmaheśvara discovered from various parts of North India, the five aspects of Śiva viz. Sadyojāta, Vāmadeva, Aghora, Tatpurusha and Īśāna are symbolically represented by five liṅgas carved in relief on the upper part of the stele of the images.

In spite of the wide popularity of Śiva worship during the late mediaeval period, worship of his Sadāśiva form was comparatively less common than his other well-known forms. The only exception is Bengal, where the cult of Sadāśiva was very popular during the Sena period. In a good number of images of Sadāśiva from Bengal, he is generally depicted as ūrdhva-medhra (membrum virile shown aloft), which proves his yogic control of the senses:

कान्तासंमिश्रदेहोऽप्यविषयमनसां यः परस्ताद्यतीनाम् ।

—Mālavikāgnimitram, I, 1.

The life-size sculpture of chatushpāda-Sadāśiva found at Khajuraho is of great iconographic interest. The Vishṇudharmottara Purāṇa (III, 48, 18) calls the bull, the mount of Śiva, the divine four-footed Dharma. But no description of chatuṣpāda-Sadāśiva is yet known from any of the available texts. Besides this, the depiction of Sadāśiva as found in the images and also on the seals of the royal charters of the Sena kings of Bengal does not appear to be fully based on the descriptions given in the Purāṇas and other works on iconography.

Sculptures and miniature paintings representing Mahāsadāśiva, though quite few, present a rich variety for a student of Hindu iconography. The Mānasāra and Rūpamaṇḍana supply some information of a Mahāsadāśiva image, but excepting the image from Vaithisvarankoyil, no other depiction of the god agrees with the description given in the texts. Similarly, no literary data are available for the images of chatuṣpāda and aṣṭapāda-Mahāsadāśiva and Mahāsadāśiva with his consort.

Though numerous sculptures of devī, both in her benign and terrific aspects, are known from various parts of the country, yet her representation as an independent deity, in the form of consort of Sadāśiva, having five heads and ten arms, is extremely important. However, it is interesting to note that this particular form of the goddess was mainly worshipped in the Chamba-Kangra region of Himachal Pradesh. Perhaps it was due to the influence of Tāntricism which was inseparably mixed up with Śaivism and Śāktism during the mediaeval period. Several of the images of Sadāśiva and his Śakti show them wearing a garland of human skulls and carrying deadly weapons besides a kapāla or a muṇḍa in their hands.

This brief attempt to trace the origin and development of the images of Sadāśiva, Mahāsadāśiva and consort of Sadāśiva is a humble effort and was undertaken in the hope that it would inspire similar monographs on other forms of Śiva.

THE AUTHOR

Dr. B. N. Sharma, Keeper, National Museum, New Delhi, is the author of Social & Cultural History of Northern India (c. 1000-1200 A.D.), Iconography of Revanta and Festivals of India. He has also contributed extensively in Indian and foreign scholarly journals on various aspects of Indology, particularly iconography and art.

In 1971, he organised the exhibition of 'Indian Art through the Ages' in the "Man And His World", exposition in Montreal.

In 1973 at the invitation of the U.S. Department of State and American Association of Museums, he was deputed by the Government to represent India at the International Conference of Museologists held at New York and other places and also to attend the meeting of the American Association of Museums at Milwaukee.

In 1975, he was offered a Fellowship by the J.D.R. 3rd Fund, New York to study Indian art collections in the museums of U.S.A., Canada, Great Britain and different countries of Europe and Asia.
